Other influences that affect the propagation of light in fiber and contribute to optical loss are temperature variations along the fiber, mechanical stress, and material non-linearity. The wall grows from the ground without mediation, as if it were a monolith, and it is structured from a threefold hierarchy of elements: the continuous surface of the bottom plane, on which the openings, topped by lintels, are located; the cusp pillars that mark the binary rhythm of the openings and that close the product, embroidering the coping of the wall through the sheen of the metal flashing;

the slender one-head-butresses that lean on stone corbels on the first level, disconnecting the higher level from a base socle.

Far from complaining of such irregularities, I consider that they were in keeping with the style of the building.
